Introduction of Urban Data Challenge

Since the end of the last decade, the use of open data (secondary use and machine-readable formats) has emerged as a political and cultural movement for the realization of citizen participation. In particular, open government, citizen participation, transparency in government, and public and private cooperation were established as goals in the U.S. by the Obama administration in 2009.

We held a workshop (Urban Data Challenge), the purpose of which was to promote participatory workshops with a data set that has been offered free of charge or with open geospatial data from local governments. Along with the discussion of regional issues in local government, this data set can help to solve urban problems.
